

know that many of the opportunities I have are a direct result of the scholarship program."

Hardy Spoehr, executive director of Papa Ola Lōkahi, the administrative branch of the Native Hawaiian Health Care systems, says: "All the scholarship students come out of their special Hawaiian seminars with a sense of Hawaiian culture that others may not have. They become aware of culturally appropriate ways, such as how to approach kūpuna [elders]. By 2002—when Federal funds are up for reauthorization—we'll have at least a hundred Hawaiian health professionals in the field."

In 1985, "You could count on two hands the number of Hawaiian physicians in Hawai'i," Spoehr says. "If these scholarships can continue for a total of 20 years, we'll build a pipeline of health services for 50 years—and make major changes in Hawaiians' health status."

The idea of how powerful a rich presence of Hawaiians in health care could be first came to Oliveira while she worked with Hale Na'au Pono, then bloomed big on a trip she arranged in 1997 for some of her women mental health clients. They spent three days on Kaho'olawe, the limited-access island that is still in transition from being a military practice bombing target to a re-sanctified cultural resource for Hawaiians. Oliveira saw metaphors for both her clients and herself.

"I talked to them about how the breakdowns in their lives were like Kaho'olawe's destruction," she says. "Their recovery will take their families' help. Nobody can do it alone. Kaho'olawe represents that. You can't be by yourself—it's contradictory to the Hawaiian perspective."

Oliveira is convinced that such cultural experiences are essential to the recovery of Hawaiian health. She also knows the major obstacle: funding.

Her new mission is to develop ways of documenting cultural approaches to solving mental health problems, to help ensure such programs will not forever be relegated to "fighting for funding scraps."

In 1997, to start a doctoral program in social welfare at the University of Hawai'i, she shifted her role at Hale Na'au Pono from directing day-to-day operations to consulting. She also began consulting at Wai'anae's Hui Hana Pono Clubhouse program and facilitating a women's group in the community for the Ho'omau Ke Ola drug and alcohol treatment center.

She is currently a consultant for the Native Hawaiian Health Care Systems (one office of which is on the Wai'anae Coast), and for the Kahumana Residential Treatment Center. She is also conducting research with the UH Department of Psychology to look at the impact of managed care on the severely mentally ill.

Farrington Highway is a fact of life, as Oliveira commutes from her Waikale home to Wai'anae.

There's much to be done. This is confirmed by Annie Siufanua, clinic intake coordinator at the mental health center. "On the Wai'anae Coast, we don't have anger management training, or programs for sex abuse or domestic violence," says Siufanua. "One psychiatrist comes three days a week. Sometimes you can't get an ambulance—there are only two for 65,000 people. The entire health care outlook is getting worse."

That doesn't deter Oliveira. "Our mission is to improve the health status of native Hawaiians. It's worth it if you can make a difference in even one person's life." She says, pausing. "But you pray at night that in 10 years the daughter of your client won't be in the clinic for the same thing."

By the time Oliveira finishes a Wai'anae day, the sandy beaches border the highway gleam gold in the sinking sun. Already in her short career, she has served Wai'anae well. The community has also served her. It's here she developed her idea that "there's not enough for us Hawaiians at the policy level. That's why we have a hard time getting the funding we need."

Driving home, she keeps one eye on the road, the other scanning the mountains and the sea in this community where she has learned so much. "I couldn't have asked God to put me in a better place to prepare me to go home to work in Hāna," she says.

And that preparation is already paying off. Julie Oliveira has recently begun providing individual and family therapy in Hāna two weekends a month.

CELEBRATING THE FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF DEATH VALLEY NATIONAL PARK

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, November 9, 1999

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to celebrate the fifth anniversary of the creation of Death Valley National Park, which protects and provides public access to some of the most dramatic scenery in the United States in a pristine desert environment that is unmatched in the world.

Death Valley became the largest national park in the lower 48 states when it was changed from national monument status and expanded to 3.3 million acres in 1994. More than 1.3 million people travel to the park now, and the historic Furnace Creek Inn remains open year-round—even through 130-degree summer days.

This spectacular park includes the lowest point in the Western Hemisphere—Badwater, at 282 feet below sea level—and mountain peaks over 11,000 feet tall. Much of the park is breathtakingly desolate wilderness, but visitors can also relive the time of the Gold Rush through ghost towns and the internationally famous Scotty's Castle.

In the past five years, the park staff has grown to include an archeologist, a botanist and hydrologist to research and protect the unique natural resources. The staff has successfully begun a multi-year effort to capture and remove the more than 500 burros who were introduced by miners, and who compete for scarce food and water with native wildlife like the Desert Bighorn Sheep. Non-native vegetation is also being removed.

The staff has also restored and improved historical resources like Scotty's Castle, and installed 60 new wayside interpretive exhibits, with plans for 50 more.

The park service has made efforts to ensure compensation and flexibility for private owners who property was included in the park, although some problems remain. We must urge the park service to make resolution of those inholder problems a top priority in the years to come.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and my colleagues to join me in congratulating Park Superintendent Dick Martin and his staff for creating a world-class national park in this unique natural environment. Their efforts have ensured that the treasures of the desert can be viewed by many more visitors—and protected for all those who will come in the future.

TRIBUTE TO SERGEANT THOMAS J. SHANLEY

HON. PETER J. VISCLOSKY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, November 9, 1999

Mr. VISCLOSKY. Mr. Speaker, at a time when crime concerns are on every citizen's mind, those who have dedicated their lives to law enforcement are to be commended. I would like to make a special commendation to Sergeant Thomas J. Shanley, a devoted law enforcement officer from Indiana's First Congressional District. Sergeant Shanley retired from the Schererville Police Department in September of this year after 21½ years of dedicated service. Sergeant Shanley will be honored by his family, friends, and members of the Schererville Police Department at a testimonial dinner Friday, November 12, 1999 at Teibel's Restaurant in Schererville, Indiana.

Thomas Shanley joined the Schererville Police Department on February 28, 1978 and graduated from the 51st class of the Indiana Law Enforcement Academy in July of 1978. He began his duties at the Schererville Police Department in the Patrol Division where in February of 1980 he was promoted to 1st Class Patrolman. Five years later he was promoted to the rank of Corporal and in 1989 was promoted to Sergeant. During his career with the Schererville Police Department, Sergeant Shanley served as a Certified firearms Instructor, an Instructor for the citizens Police Academy, Coordinator for the Field training program, and Coordinator for the Department Training program. He was most recently elected President of Training Coordinators for the Northwest Indiana Law Enforcement Training Center.

While Sergeant Shanley has dedicated considerable time and energy to his work with the Schererville Police Department, he has never limited the time he gives to his most important interest, his family. He and his wife Kathryn have one son, Patrick, age 10.

On this special day, I offer my heartfelt congratulations to Sergeant Shanley. His large circle of family and friends can be proud of the contributions this prominent individual has made to the law enforcement community and the First Congressional District of Indiana.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that you and my other distinguished colleagues join me in commending Sergeant Thomas Shanley for his lifetime of service and dedication to the people of Northwest Indiana and the citizens of the United States. Sergeant Shanley can be proud of his service to Indiana's First Congressional district. He worked hard to make the Town of Schererville a safer place in which to live and work. I sincerely wish him a long, happy, healthy, and productive retirement.
